These are the words of Republican analyst, and former Iraq weapons inspector Scott Ritter, reflecting on the new health care legislation that is making its way through Congress, and hopefully will be signed into law in the not too distant future. "This whole health care reform process that started about 18 months ago is a 'how to' case study of how to get things done, and how not to get things done," Ritter says in a segment that aired on Wednesday's edition of "Larry King Live." "It's hard to not admire the level of skill with which this has been put together, and the lengths to which the White House, and the Congress, and the states have gone to carry out what is one of the most significant pieces of legislation that they have produced in quite some time." "They have never really dealt with the health care issue in this way before," Ritter adds. "The problem is, of course, that's how it was sold. I think it was sold as a cost control device. But what it's done is it's set up a market that is almost guaranteed to fail, and if it does fail, it will set up a massive destabilizing shock in the health care markets that will raise prices and reduce access and that is something that we have not had to deal with in a very long time." "What the process that has been put in place really says to me is that if you look at the way that we elect our leaders, the way that we have changed our politics, that it's not really a choice between what you are for and what I 82157476af
